

I paid a decent amount for my iPhone. I also paid a even more decent amount for my laptop. These things are mine and I paid for them. I have the right to do anything I want with my laptop, which is run on Apple's consistently updating software. I paid to use this. I did the same for my iPhone. The fact that i cannot get full access to the hardware that I bought is absolutely mental. I understand Apple's POV as in most of the end-users are idiots and don't have the slightest inclination to make their devices function at full capacity. But for the electronic enthusiasts we have a large group, but we are not the majority by any means. Apple wants their iPhones to behave exactly how they tested them in the lab with all of their code or approved code running with hitches or clichés. When you jailbreak and start to run 3rd party programs things can get messy and if you don't really know what your doing you can fuck up your phone (usually not permanently). But most people don't because they learn rom the internet how to prevent it and everything. We don't want to fuck with apple's code we just want what we paid for/////