I'm supporting the jailbreaking exception of smartphones.

I'm a developer and also a user of smartphones.

I'm writing particularly concerning Android phones (including my Motorola Cliq). The problem with these is manufacturers are churning them out so quickly that they're not upgrading the operating system enough. It's becoming a useless piece of junk because software gets developed for the latest operating system. Users are basically left for dead by manufacturers and the only saviors we have are those who jailbreak phones and put the latest operating systems onto the phones.

By preventing jailbreaking, you're doing a disservice to consumers. And I'd posit that by abandoning their users and barely a year old devices, the manufacturers can no longer claim that jailbreaking violates DMCA...
